I WROTE THE BRAND RULES, THEN BROKE THEM THIRTEEN TIMES

I shipped thirteen assets that broke my own written standard, and I caught none of them by eye.

Counted across one batch of assets, not a guess.

I WAS THE ONE WHO WROTE IT DOWN

A colour per section, a shape per status, a fixed set of colourways, and a short list of things the copy never does.

Then I produced a run of assets at speed, checked them the way everybody checks their own work, and pushed them out.

BREAKS I FOUND ON MY OWN WORK

13

assets out of one batch broke the standard I had written myself, and reviewing them by eye had cleared every one.

Nothing exotic. A wrong ground colour, a banned word in a headline, a punctuation mark the house style does not use.

WHAT A MACHINE READS BEFORE ANYTHING SHIPS

01	No client name anywhere in copy or on a slide	HARD STOP
02	No supplier tied to a named job	HARD STOP
03	No margin, no pay, no money figures	HARD STOP
04	No screenshot of a live book, demo tenant only	HARD STOP
05	Never open on the words everybody opens on	STYLE
06	Zero of one punctuation mark the house style does not use	STYLE

Six rules, read automatically on every asset and every line of copy.

THE REVIEWER WAS THE PROBLEM

A HUMAN PASS

Reads intent

You see what you meant to make. Familiarity is the enemy, and you are the most familiar reader you have.

A MACHINE PASS

Reads characters

It has no idea what you meant. It counts, it matches, it fails loudly, and it does not get tired on asset nine.

> A standard nobody can check automatically is a preference, and it will be broken by the person who wrote it first.

WHICH IS EXACTLY WHAT HAPPENED HERE, THIRTEEN TIMES, IN ONE BATCH.

THE VERSION IN YOUR SHOP

Your logo usage guide, your quote template, the rule about how the client name gets spelled. All of it lives in a document somebody read once.

Pick the rule that matters most and make it mechanical. A required field, a checklist that blocks sending, a template that will not let the wrong thing through.

SAME TREATMENT, INSIDE THE PLATFORM

Promo shops can request access. The rules that guard the work are part of what I am actually selling.

CHECKS BEFORE SEND

NOTHING AUTO SENDS

ACCESS BY REQUEST

stoutintel.com/sips